UK Outlook for Monday 3 May 2021 to Wednesday 12 May 2021:
A transition to more unsettled conditions is likely at the start of this period, bringing an increased likelihood of persistent rain and stronger winds from Monday onwards, and temperatures are likely to stay below average at the start of this period. Showery conditions could well occur between these unsettled spells, with showers developing fairly widely most days, though many areas will see some sunny spells too. Showers are likely to fall as snow over high ground in the north. Nights will remain cold with some overnight frosts, though these becoming more restricted to the north. Temperatures are likely to remain below average overall though there are signs that they could recover back closer to average by the end of the period.
